Five Girls Victimized

by Mimi Teahan
Assistant News Editor

Within the past two weeks, five female students have been held up at gunpoint, in two possibly related incidents.

The first hold-up occurred on January 20, at 8:30 p.m. A female freshman was walking home from the library back to her room in Hammernan when she noticed three black males heading toward her. "I saw them behind me, out of the corner of my eye," she said. "They came over and one of them pointed a gun at me, while the other two stood behind him. One of them said 'Give me your bag,' and I did," she said. Without further threat, the three men took off with the bag and the student ran back to her room and contacted Loyola Security.

A similar incident happened on January 25, when four female students were walking back from Corky's Liquors. The four students were coming off of Notre Dame Lane and into the back of McAuley apartments, when they were approached by two black males. "The two guys walked past us and then turned around," said a senior who was involved in the hold-up. "It was a late decision. One of them said to me 'If you don't tell your friends to stop (walking) they'll get it.' One of the girls handed the man the bag she was carrying, which had a bottle of Schnapp's inside it. The men took a case of beer and $8.00 from another girl. The senior pointed out that because it was cold and snowing there was nobody around the area where the hold-up took place.

She said that the two men ran away from the girls and back down Notre Dame Lane. The girls ran the other way, back to one of the McAuley apartments and notified Security.

One man is believed to have been involved in both of the robberies. He is described as "a black male, 25-30 years, 5'11, 230 lbs, wearing a brown leather jacket and ski cap." The students who were robbed are confident that the same man was involved both times.

The students involved in the hold-ups had jewelry and other valuables with them, but point out that the men didn't demand anything but money, and—in the second incident—liquor. "They wanted immediate things," said one of the students.

The student robbed on January 20 said that her bag was recently found on the tennis courts by Butler Hall. The only things missing from it were $35.00 and a bank card.

According to Steve Tabeling, director of Security, Security has raised the number of patrolmen in the sights of the two crimes, as well as using electronic devices to lower the risk of crime in these areas. They have also notified the security department of the College of Notre Dame. Notre Dame plans to up their security also.

Baltimore City Police are currently investigating the hold-ups.

Although all the students were relieved that they weren't harmed physically, they all agree that the hold-ups were frightening. "You feel scared about what could have happened," said the freshman.

The four girls that were coming back from the liquor store said that they thought they were safe because they were walking in a group.

"There's not safety in numbers," one of them said. "You really shouldn't walk anywhere at night if you can avoid it."

Loyola Security strongly advises that all students be aware of their surroundings and take precautions so that similar incidents do not occur again. Security suggests that students walk in groups on well-lit paths, and that they wear shoes that they are able to run in if an attempted hold-up occurs.

Tabeling stresses that students should use the school escort system when walking across the campus at night. He would like to use male students as escorts as well as security officers. Tabeling also wants to start a "Dorm Watch" program similar to the "Neighborhood Watch" programs used across the United States.

"The more eyes we have out there," he said, "the better off we are."

Federal Cuts Won't Affect Loyola

by Barbara Linsenmeyer
News Staff Reporter

A new "economic summit" package worked out by Congress in late November to help out the federal budget deficit is good news for students who rely on financial aid.

The new package being debated by Congress would cut less drastically into student aid than if the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings law was passed.

The "economic summit" package would, if chosen, more selectively trim the deficit by 75 million dollars during the next two years. Observers say the new package would have less of an impact on students with aid. Gramm-Rudman would require that all federal departments be cut by 23 billion dollars in fiscal 1988, which began October 1.

If the alternative plan does not go into effect automatic cuts required by Gramm-Rudman would reduce funding for Guaranteed Student Loans, Pell Grants, and other financial aid programs according to Dr. A. Dallas Martin of the National Association of Student Financial Aid Administrators.

"It's too soon to tell what the final outcome will be," said Martin. "But we're looking for an alternative to Gramm-Rudman-Hollings."

"All year, Congress has made bipartisan commitments to increasing education funding," said Mary Preston of the United States Student Association. "Now Gramm-Rudman has gone through and reversed everything. The compromise budget is a better alternative than Gramm-Rudman." More than 100 members of the House signed a letter in early November pleading for education to be protected from major spending cuts.

The compromise budget, said Martin, would require "less cuts" from education. Part of the bill would require a 250 million dollar cut from the GSL program, by tapping the reserve funds held by state agencies that guarantee student loans. This would enable students to probably continue borrowing as much as they do now.

However, Martin does predict that the student loan origination fees, which were raised from 5 percent to 5.5 percent earlier this fall, will be continued.

Congressional Republicans have balked at the compromise calls for tax increases. If Republican opposition can be overcome, Martin said, it's "unlikely" students will suffer.

According to Mark Lindenmeyer, Director of Loyola's Financial Aid office, unless federal student aid programs are cut drastically at Loyola, "These particular changes will have no effect."

The changes in aid that most affect students at Loyola have to do with the Guaranteed Student Loan program. According to Lindenmeyer these include major changes in eligibility, drastic changes in funding, or elimination. "Whenever G.S.L. is affected, then we are affected, but so far this issue has no particular significance to our students."

The proposed plan has yet to be approved by Congress.

Loyola Makes Move to Belgium

by Gate Gillen
Assistant News Editor

Loyola may soon expand beyond its Evergreen and Columbia campuses next year, if plans to start a "Loyola presence abroad" in Leuven, Belgium come through, according to Dr. Bernard Nachbahr of the Philosophy department.

Nachbahr sent students letters about the proposed program over Christmas break. The letter explained Loyola's plan to start its own center in Belgium, in conjunction with the University of Leuven, the oldest Catholic university in the world.

Nachbahr held a meeting in a packed Ruzica Hall on Tuesday, January 26 for students interested in studying in Leuven next year. He stressed that this was "a meeting to measure student interest," and that specifics for the program had not yet been fully determined.

According to Dean Joseph Healy, the Study Abroad Committee, of which Nachbahr was a member, recently submitted a report about Loyola's study abroad policies ad programs to the College Council.

One of the components of the report dealt with the possibility of establishing a Loyola center of study abroad, of which Leuven was one possibility.

The Faculty Senate is expected to discuss the report and the Leuven project in specific at its next meeting, according to Healy.

According to Nachbahr, the purpose of the Leuven program is to establish a presence abroad and afford students the opportunity to study at a foreign university.

He explained that this will not be a "total immersion" program because Loyola students will live together and will take classes in English.

He said that credits will be transferable, but grades will not.

Nachbahr said that Loyola plans to rent, lease, or buy living facilities on Leuven for Loyola students. He said that there are several cafeterias on campus, and that food prices are reasonable.

According to Nachbahr, students studying at Loyola at Leuven will pay the same tuition as they do here. He said that scholarships will be transferable. "You would just pay Loyola the same price, and Loyola will pay Leuven," said Nachbahr.

Like most European Universities, Leuven is on a very different schedule than American schools, according to Nachbahr. Fall semester will run from the first Monday in October until the end of January, and the second semester from February until late May. Final examinations for both semesters will be held in June.

Because of this schedule, students who are interested in a year at Leuven will probably be chosen above students interested in one semester only. Nachbahr said that some students may be selected to go for the spring term, but that no students may go for fall term only.

According to Nachbahr, 20 or 30 students will be selected to participate in the program at first. He said that seniority, transcripts, and whether students wish to attend for an entire year will be determining factors in the selection process.

"If there is a great interest in the program, hopefully it will grow," said Nachbahr. "We plan to send about 50 more students the spring semester if everything goes well. We will have to see."

Nachbahr distributed forms for interested students at the meeting. He said that students should fill them out and return them to his office by February 15.

Ribbon Cut at Garden Grocer

by Katie O'Donnell
News Staff Reporter

The Garden Grocer, Loyola's new convenience store, is an innovative idea geared toward the Loyola student and his needs. The store is part of a three school trial program sponsored by Follet United Book Store. Carl Rosendorf, President of Follet United Book Store stated, "The purpose of the stores is to be convenient to the student."

The Garden Grocer, established in November, was instituted for the purpose of observing a mini-mart in a mid-size school. Follet and the Loyola Administration hoped that the mini-mart would generate enough business in a school the size of Loyola. "This store is receiving great management support. It is part of a three store trial, a prototype of what we feel is the next generation on campuses," said Rosendorf. Most mini-marts existed in large universities and had prospered. If the Garden Grocer is successful it will set a precedence for mid-size and smaller campuses around the country.

Loyola approached Follet's about establishing a mini-mart on campus. Follet has 87 bookstores in colleges around the country, but only two other mini-marts. Follet's responded positively to the new concept and the mini-mart became a reality in mid-November.

The primary goal of the Garden Grocer is to provide for the college student. Rosendorf stated, "The selection and variety that the stores have depend on student demand." There are approximately 1500 students on the west side of Charles street who could use the conveniences provided by the mini-mart. The Garden Grocer, because it is geared toward the college student, provides food and other necessities at prices at or below the prices in the nearby convenience stores. "We've done some price studies, we're very sensitive to that issue and we feel we're very comparable," said Rosendorf.

McL Blackburn, director of food services at Loyola stated, "In comparison to other convenience stores, we have a wider variety targeted at the college student." Blackburn continued, "The prices will not always lie below the convenience stores. The margin is very small; therefore there is not too much room for discounting." The prices in the Garden Grocer must stay competitive with other convenience stores.

ASLC Revamps Structure

by Eric Blomquist
Special to the Green & Grey

After several years of debate and discussion, the ASLC has agreed upon a new student government constitution. The document, approved unanimously by the Administrative Council last October, will be put to a campus-wide referendum this Wednesday, February 3. Voting will take place in the McManus Theater Lobby from 10:00 a.m. to 5:00 p.m. and student government officials are hoping for a large turnout. Loyola College ID is required in order to vote.

Under the new constitution, the name of Loyola's student government would be changed from the Associated Students of Loyola College (ASLC) to the Loyola College Student Government Association (SGA). It is hoped by ASLC officials that the change of name will improve the visibility of student government on campus, especially for those students who do not realize what the initials "ASLC" mean.

Along with the change in name would come a restructuring of the student government into three separate and independent branches, modeled after those of the United States government. The Legislative Assembly, made up of twenty-five Student Senators, the Executive Council, which includes thirteen executive positions, and the Judicial Board, consisting of five student officials, will be complemented by students filling thirty appointed positions. Student body president and Constitutional Committee Chairman Brian Annulis hopes that the increased number of student government positions will mean more participation and fairer representation.

Annulis and the seven-member Constitutional Committee met periodically throughout the summer and school year to draw up the constitution, which Annulis believes to be the first since the late Seventies. After reviewing constitutions from other schools and writing a rough draft, Annulis incorporated suggestions from the constitutional committee and, later, the Administrative Council.

Director of Student Activities Lisa Madgar commented that she was impressed with the work of the committee, while admitting that she was a little skeptical last year about the project's chances after seeing similar plans fall through in previous years.

According to Annulis, the main hurdle yet to be overcome is convincing students to take the time to vote on Wednesday. In an effort to boost student awareness and support of the new constitution, Annulis and others have been distributing copies of the document around campus to the residence halls, cafeteria, and information desk. Annulis and other members of the constitutional committee will also be on hand to entertain questions and comments about the constitution at an open forum during activity period Tuesday, in Maryland Hall 200.

their weekly shopping excursions, such as small snacks and toiletries. Blackburn realizes the students' desire for different items and evaluates the Garden Grocer, changing the wide variety according to students' needs. "We're working with and supplying the students' needs," said Rosendorf.

Blackburn hopes that the Garden Grocer will be a successful and useful addition to Loyola. He said that the college hopes the mini-mart will break even or make a profit, but stresses that the importance of the store is that the students' needs are fulfilled.

Sales levels are high and Blackburn said that sales were higher than what was expected for the end of the 1987 semester. The Garden Grocer will be a permanent addition to Loyola's campus as long as it serves the students, breaks even, or makes a profit. Blackburn stated that if the mini-mart declines, the administration will re-evaluate it and make the necessary changes to make it an asset to the west side of campus.

Support and promotion of the management back the Garden Grocer. Rosendorf and promoters for Ben and Jerry's ice cream appeared at the ribbon-cutting ceremony. Loyola's promotional ideas, putting varied items on special each week and sponsoring contests such as the "Name the Store" contest, raise the hopes of the administration that Loyola's mini-mart will be a permanent addition.

Blackburn emphasized the numerous benefits of the Garden Grocer. He said that all personal checks are accepted with appropriate Loyola I.D., the Garden Grocer accepts manufacturer coupons which increase the students' opportunity to buy an item at a good price. The prices, relative to coupon discount, will be below convenience stores prices.

Neighborhood Coalition Limits Expansion...

by Jim Choplick
News Staff Reporter

Although it seems that both Loyola and the Northern Baltimore Neighborhood Coalition are happy with the recent agreement that they have hammered out, at one time the relationship between the two parties was best described as "a battle."

At least that's how Tom Swiss, a resident of Chenley Road and a member of the coalition bargaining team describes it. "When we found out they [Loyola] were building behind Wynnewood Towers, we felt they had gone behind our backs," he said. "It yanked our chains. We knew we were in a battle."

Although Michael Coff, vice president of Loyola Development and College Relations, says that "the college has always met with its neighbors," there was a time when communication between the two seemed to break down. It occurred with Loyola's proposal to build the Garden Apartments, residences for Loyola students.

The Garden Apartments were being built on property owned by the college. Because of this, says Swiss, the coalition had no leverage in its negotiations with the college.

According to Swiss, in 1985, the coalition met with Benjamin Cardin, then Speaker of the House in Annapolis, to gain that leverage. "We went to Cardin and told him all we wanted was an agreement to growth, plans, and ideas," he said.

At this time, Loyola was about to receive a bond from the State of Maryland's capital assistance program worth $2 million towards the college's new classroom and laboratory facility.

All bonds from the State of Maryland must be signed by the Speaker of the House as a formality. According to Renee Cohen, Cardin's community outreach official at the time, "Cardin devised a way to get both sides to work on a solution."

Cardin added a clause to the bond stipulating that Loyola would not receive the money for their new building without talking with the coalition. The neighborhoods had found their leverage.

"Cardin agreed that Loyola had to behave like a neighbor, and if they wanted their $2 million revenue bond, they were going to have to talk [with us]," said Swiss.

When asked how often clauses are added to revenue bonds, Cohen responded "not very often." However, he did point to other examples of give-and-take between institutions and communities, namely the proposal for new stadiums at Camden Yards.

Coff said that the clause was added to the bond, "in the middle of the process," even though it appears that talks between the two sides were at a stalemate. After dealing with the bond, Cardin appointed an arbitrator to handle the proceedings.

"He [Cardin] recognizes the importance of expansion for the college," said Cohen, "but he felt there needed to be some sensitivity shown towards their neighbors."

Goff calls Loyola "unique in how well thought-out its future is," pointing towards examples such as the college's decision to evolve into a residential school after noticing a very low number of college-age people in Baltimore.

And Places a Cap on Loyola's Enrollment...

by Stacy Donovan
Asst. Business Editor

The agreement Loyola College made with the neighborhood Coalition will have "no direct negative financial implication" on the college community, according to Paul Melanson, Dean of Administration and Finance.

The agreement focuses on a cap on the total undergraduate enrollment for the next 10 years. Because of this cap, there was concern on campus that tuition might be raised to compensate for this provision.

Loyola agreed to limit student population in part to ease tensions in the surrounding communities and to facilitate approval of present and future construction. But Melanson said that it is necessary for "the quality of life at Loyola" to keep the resident population between 2200 and 2250, with total undergraduate enrollment set between 2700 and 2800.

"The cap wasn't designed to increase tuition. Every effort was made not to increase tuition," said Dr. Doris Van Doren of the Marketing Department.

Both Melanson and Van Doren agree that more students will cost the college. "The more students we admit, the more spaces we need, that is, more housing, and more classrooms," said Melanson.

"In addition, we'll need to hire more faculty, which in the end won't solve any problems," he added.

According to Dr. Richard Franke of the Management and Law Department, and chairman of the Faculty Compensation Committee, "Loyola has already experienced its sharpest tuition increases."

Franke says he doesn't foresee "tuition increasing because we won't be admitting more students." He explained that these sharp increases occurred between 1983 and 1986, and "now Loyola will probably increase tuition according to the national average."

Mark Lindenmeyer, director of Financial Aid, said, "The final decision on tuition is made by the Board of Trustees after a recommendation is made by the deans and the vice presidents."

Lindenmeyer said tuition increased almost 10 percent last year. "Some might feel that this is an impressive increase," said Franke, "but if you look at the average over the past 20 years it's not such a big raise."

The agreement also sets stipulations on where off-campus students may reside. They are excluded from seven of the surrounding neighborhoods, including Kernwood, Radnor-Winston, and Guilford,

Melanson believed the cap was reasonable because of scheduling and classroom space, but added, "It is unfortunate we've reached this point, but someone at the college felt that this was an agreement that had to be made."

"Unless the residences are specifically designed as apartment dwellings," according to Dr. Susan Hickey of the Residence Life Office.

Students that are now living in those areas are being asked to move, and "are being welcomed back on campus," said Hickey. She feels that this agreement "doesn't really affect on campus residents."

She explains that there are presently 30-50 available spaces on campus for off-campus students, delayed admissions and transfer students. "Fifteen of these spaces are reserved for delayed admissions students," she said.

But Scheye Has His Eye on Guilford.

by Trif Alatzas
Associate Editor

Years of rumors and speculation concerning the sale of Guilford Towers to Loyola College have been cleared up as Loyola officials and the management of the building have explained their plans and interests involving the structure.

Nestled within three college dormitories, the Guilford Towers, at 14 W. Cold Spring Lane, is the only building that restricts the constant flow of the whole Loyola College campus.

According to Dr. Thomas Scheye, Provost at Loyola College, the owners of the building made an offer to the school that was too expensive for the college's interest.

"The owners told us a few years ago that they would sell Guilford Towers for $10 million, but we can not pay that much money for a building that isn't worth it," said Scheye.

He explained that Loyola bought both sides of Wynnewood Towers for $6 million, and because of that cost, it would not be in the best interests of the college to purchase the Towers at that price, though the college is very interested in acquiring the building.

"One day we will own that building," Scheye said, "When the price is right we will definitely own it."

In the recent agreement with the surrounding neighborhoods, Loyola promised that they would not, over the next ten years, place undergraduate students in any other dorms except for an additional one to be built near the Loyola-Notre Dame library.

This, however, would not inhibit the college from buying Guilford Towers. Scheye said the college would stand behind its word, but said that if the building was acquired within the next ten years the college could still get a lot of use out of it.

"We agreed not to put undergraduate students there," said Scheye, "but we would still have the option of housing graduate students there, administration and faculty, and set up classrooms and offices there."

Guilford Towers is managed by Aldon Management in Montgomery County. John Rosenberg, director of Aldon Management, said that the building is not for sale, and knew nothing about the proposed sale of $10 million to Loyola College. "For years we have been hearing rumors about the sale of Guilford Towers," said Rosenberg, "the truth is that Guilford Towers is not for sale. It is not in our plans to sell that building."

Rosenberg said that he gets about five offers annually to purchase the building.

"Loyola wants to buy it, other firms want to put condominiums there. We get so many offers and it is frustrating because the rumor has been spreading that we would sell it, but it would be nice to get the word out that it isn't for sale."

Aldon Management manages the building but wouldn't release the name of the owner. According to the Baltimore City Tax and Assessment Guide, Guilford Towers is owned by Alvin I. Brown, who is also an employee of Aldon Management.

When contacted, Brown had no comment on owning Guilford Towers or ever offering to sell the building to Loyola College.

In a follow up interview, Scheye once again said that the building had been offered to Loyola by the owners for $10 million. Scheye, however, was unable to recall the names of the owners that offered the sale.

"I guess I can understand why they would deny that claim," said Scheye. "They don't want to eliminate anyone from the market for the sale of the building."

According to the resident manager, Patricia Ramsey, Guilford Towers is "economically content" right now. She claims that there are more than 350 people living in the building and most are individuals who live alone and support themselves.

As for the bother of Loyola College, Rosenberg said that it would not be a reason to sell the building.

"We've tried to insulate ourselves by adding more bushes to our recent landscaping, but this just goes to show you that we are not interested in selling the building," said Rosenberg.

He added that the company is going to pave a new parking lot this spring for the tenants. With efforts like these, Rosenberg cannot understand how people can think the building is on the market.

Rosenberg did admit that if anyone offered a fantastic price for the building, the owners would probably listen as businessmen.

"One day we will own that building. When the price is right we will definitely own that building," said Scheye about Guilford Towers located on W. Cold Spring Lane.

Give us a Chance to Breathe

Nineteen eighty-seven was the year of the commuter. That does not make 1988 the year of the resident, particularly those residents that live out of state.

This was demonstrated January 17. Students were informed, by mail, that the records office would be open prior to the beginning of school. Identification cards could be validated and spring class schedules obtained. For many out of state students, this was impossible to take advantage of. The letter warned that roommates could not validate the I.D.'s of friends unable to drive to Maryland.

These same out of state students were told that the records office would be open Sunday, January 17, from 12:00 to 5:00. This gave the returning student a maximum of five hours to complete the registration process. If a student wanted to attend his or her home church, or have one final Sunday lunch with his or her family, the time was lessened. Lines for elevators and parking places, compounded by the short period given for paperwork, only added to the rushed atmosphere of the day. The immediate return to classes also made the lines for buying books on Monday and Tuesday unnecessarily long.

Granted, the organized student can save his spring schedule, mailed to his school address prior to the Christmas break, and check the conveniently posted master lists for any room changes. He can survive the first day of classes without purchasing the required reading lists. He can postpone his arrival to Sunday evening in an attempt to avoid elevator lines.

But should he have to? Would it not be easier, for both the college staff and for returning students, to lengthen the time period between when students arrive on any given day, and hopefully lessen the culture shock that is caused by attending classes within eighteen hours of returning to the college environment.

The holiday of Dr. Martin Luther King may have been one better spent registering, buying books, and settling than one of a mad scrambling for immediate adaptation.

A Time For Change

Bravo!

The Associated Students of Loyola College (ASLC) have finally produced a new framework to change the student government's structure. Members of the ASLC believe a change in name, the Student Government Association, will make them more visible on campus. Beneath the change of name lies the real significance of this new constitution.

The significance lies in the decentralization of power. More people will be involved in the decision making process and power will be distributed between three branches, like the United States government.

The powers of the Executive Committee have been lessened and redistributed to the Legislative Assembly thereby giving student representatives more of a say.

Other changes in the constitution follow this pattern of increasing student involvement. The constitution as a whole is designed more logically than the old one in respect to aligning powers and responsibilities according to different offices in the organizational structure.

ASLC President Brian Annulis and his Constitutional Committee should be congratulated in a job well done. They have given the students of Loyola a more efficient vehicle in our own governmental process.

The referendum vote to ratify this constitution will be held on Wednesday. You are encouraged to come out and vote for the future framework that holds the campus life of Loyola students.

Regardless, Hart Runs

Trif
Alatzas

Gary Hart's entrance back into the Democratic presidential race has accompanied a cast of criticisms and praise. Many have applauded his courage to stand up against the press, while still others feel he had no right to re-enter the race. His popularity and fier press coverage on his return was only short-term, and now Hart is being treated as just another member of the pack of Democratic hopefuls.

It really isn't fair to say that Hart has much courage, for he bowed out quickly last May when his relations with actress Donna Rice surfaced. If he really had the strength and stamina to withstand the increased pressures of the press, why then did he run away?

The womanizing issue is not something that should judge whether or not a man should be able to hold the highest office in this country. Hart certainly was not the first to indulge in such an activity and many doubt that he will be the last. However, being a member of the Democratic party, one would assume that Hart would have the party's best interests in mind when he runs for such a position.

Many has taken hold of this situation, for Gary Hart doesn't deserve to be the Democratic nominee because of his disregard for ethics. Not the ethical question of whether or not he was in proper judgment by spending the weekend with a woman other than his wife, but the ethics of professional malfeasance.

In every profession there is an unwritten code of ethics. In pulve work, one officer will never give another a speeding ticket or other minor violations; it's not written anywhere but that is the way the police force handles it. In journalism, you aren't supposed to step on someone else's heel, and in politics you don't jump in and out of races while your peers are hard at work campaigning.

Gary Hart has no business running for President at this point in time because he threw in the towel when things got too heavy for him to handle. Recently, politics has too often been taken as a joke. And in this instance, Hart is one of the contributing factors.

With the problems stemming from his past campaign debts, to illegal payments in 1984, as well as the womanizing issue, the Hart campaign is virtually no threat to capture the nomination. The Democratic party itself has admitted that Hart, along with Jesse Jackson, are unelectable candidates. The Hart campaign cannot keep fooling the public in American politics it just isn't possible to collect votes when you don't have any money. Hart will just about dwindle away once the primaries begin, and chances are he really won't be a welcomed candidate at the Democratic convention in July.

Hart's contenders have been as polite as they possibly can to him. But you can almost bet that they aren't too excited with his ridiculous presence in the race on the basis that the rest of the candidates aren't running on any sound ideas. So after jumping ship just six months before, here came Hart claiming to be the Democratic Messiah.

But the ethical barrier that Hart broke cannot be overlooked. While the other six candidates travelled around on the campaign bent during the last six months, Hart hid out and denied all accusations that he would be back.

Hart's challenge has been set for New Hampshire, which will hold the first primary in three weeks. He has written off Iowa, admitting that he really doesn't have a chance to win in the party caucuses there. But recent polls have shown that his popularity in N.H. has been up in half since his re-entrance back into the race.

The most disturbing fact about Hart right now is that he knows he has no chance of winning, but remains in the race to push for his "ideas." It has been speculated that he moved back into the race in order to become eligible for matching funds from the government to pay off his previous campaign debts. Either way, the ethics of politics and the responsibility Hart owes to the Democratic party have been disregarded.

Hart Hart really been thinking about the party and remained amiable on his new ideas syndrome then perhaps he should have barked one of his previous and now forgotten.

It's time for America to start taking the political process seriously. But it's pretty tough when the candidates contribute to making the whole spectrum look like a three-ring circus.

Letters to the Editor Media Board Seeks Suggestions

Over the course of the past several months, in direct response to the "infamous" Media Board proposal, numerous opinions, concerns and questions concerning student media organizations have surfaced on campus. While the official Media Board proposal has been withdrawn from consideration, it, nevertheless, appears obvious to the Student Life Commission that many issues regarding the status of student media groups at Loyola remain unresolved and open for discussion. While we are advocating NO set policy at this time, it is our profound hope that the Student Life Commission, in conjunction with the respective media groups involved, will be able to develop a policy in the future which will be mutually beneficial to all: the students and their media groups; and faculty; and the administration.

In accomplishing this task, however, we also believe it is of vital importance to solicit the general observations and impressions of the College community, as a whole, concerning student media organizations. As such, we are inviting each of you -- student, professor, and administrator alike -- to submit your appropriate comments, suggestions, and points of concern or praise regarding any student media group on campus to us for consideration. Specifically, the groups concerned are the Evergreen Annual (Yearbook), the Garland (Literary Magazine), the Green & Grey (Newspaper) and WLOR (Radio Station). All such correspondence should be in writing and addressed to the "Student Life Commission" c/o Mr. Randall Jones, Physics Department. We look forward to hearing from you in the near future.

Who's Who Requires Fairness

As a member of the Who's Who selection committee I'm writing this letter to express my displeasure with the actions of Provost Thomas Scheye in his selection of the final Who's Who list that was sent to the national selection committee.

The members of the committee set up what we saw as adequate criteria for the seniors' addition to the final list. According to that criteria, a student had to be strong in two of the three categories listed on the application. These were: 1. academic achievement, 2. co-curricular activities, and 3. service and citizenship. Many hours of deliberation were spent evaluating the various applicants and at times it was very difficult to decide on whether or not a person would be added to the final selections of the committee.

When we sent our list of the most "well-rounded" applicants to Dr. Scheye he came to us with a proposal, which as it turns out was more of a thinly veiled directive than a constructive suggestion. Dr. Scheye said he believed that senior captains of inter-collegiate teams, the president of the ASLC, the president of the senior class, and the editors of significant publications such as the Green and the Grey should automatically be placed on the list every year. Some of his "nominees" did not even take the time or responsibility to submit an application to our committee. Should these people be given preferential treatment over other, more qualified applicants who failed to make the final list submitted to Dr. Scheye? I think not.

While not belittling the accomplishments of our athletes, student government officials, and editors, I feel that it is necessary to maintain some standard of equity while choosing the final Who's Who candidates. Why should we select these people and not others who have contributed to the Loyola Community such as Resident Assistants, Evergreens, and students in other less publicized, yet important, positions? The Who's Who selection committee had set down standardized requirements for all applicants to meet. Automatically placing students on the list denigrates the entire selection process.

I feel that the final Who's Who list sent to the National Who's Who Selection Committee did not accurately reflect all the time and effort exerted by the committee in making our selections, and furthermore, I believe that Dr. Scheye was out of place in adding those names to our list.

National Hiring Forecast Appears Positive Despite Market Crash

MANPOWER, INC. — Hiring plans of U.S. business firms for the first quarter of 1988 were virtually unaffected by the recent drop in stock market prices, according to a new survey of hiring strength released today by Manpower Inc., the worldwide temporary help service.

The survey, which includes responses from over 13,000 U.S. business firms, predicts that hiring activity in the traditionally slow post-holiday period will be as strong as that seen in any comparable period of the current 60-month recovery and will reflect strength in all business sectors and geographic areas.

Over 21 percent of the businessmen surveyed say they plan to increase their workforce size in the coming quarter. This compares to 19 percent planning to hire a year ago. At the same time, firms planning to decrease their workforce dropped from the 14 percent level of a year ago to 12 percent this year.

According to Manpower Inc. President Mitchell S. Fromstein, the survey was conducted during the week following the October financial crisis, but respondents were re-surveyed in mid-November to determine if attitudes or plans were changed by market conditions. Fromstein said 96 percent of the firms in the second survey re-confirmed their original projections.

"It is quite clear," Fromstein said, "that the financial market decline had little or no effect on first quarter hiring plans. The labor market has a life and character of its own and at the moment it is robust and optimistic despite the negative signals from the stock market."

"In addition to the general hiring picture being bright, there is particular strength in the outlook for jobs in the Durable Goods Manufacturing and general Services industries—the two largest employment sectors in our society."

Geographically, the Southern states show signs of recovery from the hiring slump in the energy industries. However, all areas are more optimistic than in the comparable quarters of recent years.

Construction

Always the victim of winter weather in cold-climate areas, the Construction industry is not as pessimistic as usual. A total of 19 percent of the firms contacted plan to add to employment rolls, while 22 percent expect declines. A year ago, 16 percent foresaw increases and 26 percent predicted staff cuts. The picture is brightened by an especially favorable outlook for winter construction in the South, where 27 percent will be adding staff and 16 percent will be trimming down.

Durable Goods Manufacturing

The Durable Goods Manufacturing industries are firmly placed as one of the most optimistic sectors in the market. Nationally, 26 percent look forward to hiring additional employees, while 11 percent expect to decrease. The trend is very strong throughout the country. Only once during the 1980's has the outlook been so bright at the beginning of the year.

Note: The annual trend line represents net employment expectations for the current quarter in relation to the same periods of previous years. These figures are not adjusted for seasonal variations.

* The Measure of Hiring Expectations is the difference between the percentage of employers predicting staff increases and those planning to decrease hiring activity.

Non-Durable Goods Manufacturing

Following on the heels of a brisk fourth quarter, Non-Durable Goods Manufacturers will moderate their hiring activity somewhat. The industry is quite strong in the South and lacking in momentum for the second straight quarter in the West. Overall, 22 percent are searching for more staff and 11 percent plan employment declines. Although somewhat behind last quarter, expectations surpass those of the first quarters of the past two years.

Finance, Insurance & Real Estate

This robust industry continues in a long term growth pattern spanning the entire

Services

Service businesses are once again among the employment leaders as 26 percent plan to increase employment and only

Public Administration

Opportunities for work with local, state and federal governments are remarkably uniform in all geographic regions and numerically better than last quarter or last year. Public Administration employers are more optimistic than the national average of all employers. For the outset of 1988, 19 percent are hiring additional workers and only 7 percent are decreasing staff.

Transportation & Public Utilities

Transportation and Public Utilities employers tend to be rather consistent in fourth quarter and first quarter job patterns and the coming three months should maintain the pattern established three months ago. A total of 19 percent expect their job roles to grow and 9 percent foresee declines. The pattern is generally uniform throughout the country.

employment levels. This contrasts with the situation in the West, where 22 percent plan staff additions, while only 1 percent will cut back.

Summary

While the financial market collapse has caused a great deal of concern and fear for the future of a 5-year recovery from the 1982 recession, U.S. business firms are being guided by their own experiences in deciding whether to expand or contract their workforce levels.

The decisions seem to be going strongly in favor of increased hiring to meet current needs.

A combination of "lean" staffing levels established over several years and a demographic shortage of young workers is causing firms to increase the pace of hiring activity.

While some of the newly-created positions will be designated as part-time or temporary positions, there is evidence that the majority of hires will be full-time, permanent workers with needed clerical or manufacturing skills.

The optimism displayed by U.S. firms toward first quarter hiring should carry through at least the first six months of 1988 and, more likely, will extend through the summer and fall periods.

"In addition to the general hiring picture being bright, there is particular strength in the outlook for jobs in the Durable Goods Manufacturing and general Services industries — the two largest employment sectors in our society."

five years of the present economic recovery. A notable exception exists in the West, where the industry is way below expectations. In other regions, it is well above average. Nationally, 20 percent will increase employment compared to 8 percent indicating plans to decrease.

Wholesale & Retail Trade

The annual Cinderella of the fourth quarter holiday hiring season customarily becomes the pumpkin of the first quarter post-holiday period, but the picture this year is considerably more positive than usual. Seldom in the 12-year history of the survey has the January, February and March period looked better. While 20 percent will be decreasing their year-end employment levels, 18 percent will actually be increasing, thereby dropping the net post-Christmas decline below the levels of other years.

Education—Private & Public

Teaching and school administration jobs are the high spot of the entire Western job market, but considerably more difficult to find in the Northeast, Midwest and South. Nationally, 13 percent will add employees and 4 percent will decrease 7 percent predict staff level declines. The outlook is favorable in all regions and surpasses both the fourth and first quarters of all of the past 10 years.

1988 Employment Outlook Favorable For Maryland

by Shawn Biglin
Assistant Business Editor

This past December, the Baltimore College Job Fair had the highest number of companies participating since its inception in the early 1970's. Despite the recent economic reports that predict a recession for 1988, the large number of companies at the job fair indicates that there will be positions available for the 1988 graduates.

Most of the companies at the job fair were from the Baltimore metropolitan area. Maryland's economy possesses a rich blend of all industries and occupations. This diversity allows growth and stability when other parts of the country that are dependent on one industry are struggling. Employment in the state is expected to increase by about 20 percent from 1980 to 1990. Most of the expansion will be concentrated in the following industries: service (33%), retail trade (19%), government (13%), and manufacturing (11%) totaling 77% of Maryland's 1990 employment.

The service industry is the largest sector of Maryland's economy mainly due to the thousands of workers employed in education, health, and business services. Stalled by large numbers of professionals and technical workers as well as those less skilled, it continues to expand in response to the growing demands of the population. In this industry, a growth rate of 28% is predicted between 1980 and 1990. The service industry will also generate about 41.5% of all new jobs in the state and is least affected by economic fluctuations.

During the fall 90 firms from varied industries interviewed on campus, this is down from 102 firms that recruited in the fall of 1986. This can be contributed to the fact that there are few December graduates at Loyola, so many firms wait until the spring.

This spring approximately 85 companies are scheduled to interview on campus. "But this number is not final, I am still in contact with many companies to set up dates for the spring," stated Mary DeManns of Career Planning and Placement. Sign-ups for Spring interviews begin on February 2, 1988.

ASPA Student Chapter Initiated

by Shawn Biglin
Assistant Business Editor

The Department of Management and Law has started a new student chapter of The American Society for Personnel Administrators (ASPA) which is an association for human resource management professionals. Today, ASPA serves over 35,000 human resource executives in a wide variety of U.S. and foreign based organizations.

The benefits associated with a student chapter are numerous. Outside speakers will discuss topics of importance to you whether you are preparing for a career in the human resource field or for related positions in management. Also, many of the speakers will discuss issues of general and immediate importance such as interviewing, how to establish and maintain organizational contacts, and what to look for and avoid in a first job.

In addition, student members are able to attend the monthly dinner meetings of the local chapter. Over one hundred professionals regularly attend these meetings to listen to panel discussions, speakers and debates presented by well-known and respected individuals who are active in the human resource management field. This provides students with the opportunity to meet and engage in extended discussions with other professionals working in the Baltimore area.

As a student chapter member, there are many other benefits to be received. Students are eligible for a variety of monthly publications, the society's directory and research reports. Also, the society rewards annual scholarships and sponsors conferences. Internships are also available through the student chapter in cooperation with the local professional chapter.

An informal meeting will be held Tuesday, February 2 at 12:15 in Jenkins Hall, room 217. If any additional information is needed, please contact Dr. Christy DeVander or Dr. Husha Desai.

Well Attended Job Fairs Produce Mixed Reviews

... Philadelphia

by Andrew T. Coyne
Business Staff Writer

While a large number of college students spent the holidays relaxing or trying to earn some extra cash for the next semester, others traveled to Philadelphia to participate in Operation Native Talent on December 29 and 30 at the Wyndham Hotel on 17th and Race Streets. Operation Native Talent (ONT) is a yearly en masse recruiting drive sponsored by the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce and the Penndel Committee. The objective is to provide an interviewing means for out-of-state students as well as vacationing local students. The goal is to keep or maintain the elite employment prospects in the Philadelphia area so local organizations can utilize this resource.

Companies at the job fair consisted of large, multi-national firms and more regional, lesser-known companies. Some of the companies included: Cigna, DuPont, IBM, Lavenhol & Horwath, The Vanguard Group, and Xerox. The eighty-odd companies recruiting at ONT interviewed an estimated total of 5,000 to 6,000 prospective employees in the two-day period. While the majority of the job seekers were from the Philadelphia area, a small percentage came from as far away as Atlanta, Massachusetts, and Ohio.

Naturally, while participating in such a large interviewing process, several criticisms were voiced. Chris Fandelli, a structural engineering major from The University of Pennsylvania, stated, "There really wasn't a lot for me down here; my major is kind of specialized. I met with only four companies."

John Forde, a senior marketing major from Loyola who lives in the Philadelphia area, felt that some major industries were poorly represented. He stated, "I was mainly interested in advertising firms and not selling vacuum cleaner attachments through cold calling at a 100 percent commission." Thomas Marturano, a finance major from Spring College, had no complaints about any industry, but he criticized the manner in which the interviews were conducted. Tom replied, "There must be sixty companies that are looking for someone with my background. It's too bad that the companies didn't send more representatives. I hate standing in line."

Others at the fair stressed only the benefits. Mary Ellen O'Hara, a Loyola College marketing major, said, "This is great. Where else can you meet 25 to 30 representatives in person who focus on your interests and strengths and will give your resume to the different department heads?" In fact, each person interviewed stressed that despite any shortcomings, it was well worth the effort to make the trip. All agreed that even if a position wasn't offered, the experience would be useful during job recruiting.

For juniors interested in working in the Philadelphia, New Jersey, or Delaware areas, Operation Native Talent will be conducted again sometime after the coming Christmas. Information will be available through Career Planning and Placement.

According to Cresaundra C. Sills, Director of Loyola College Career Planning and Placement, "Loyola students deserve a pat on the back for their outstanding performance at the College Job Fair '87" (held on Tuesday, December 29, 1987 at the Towson Center, Towson State University.)

Sills credits Loyola students with the foresight to prepare themselves for the interviews. Consequently, she received some very favorable feedback from company representatives. In fact, one company, Blinder Robinson, was so impressed with Loyola students that they are coming to recruit more Loyola students on campus in the spring.

Blinder Robinson, a Colorado based investment banking firm with offices in Columbia, was one of the 103 companies which sent representatives to this year's College Job Fair. Of the more than two-thousand students who attended the Fair, 170 were from Loyola. Loyola ranked second in the number of students in attendance. Towson had the largest turnout of students with UNBC ranking third. Overall, 229 colleges and universities were represented.

Although Sills thought that this College Job Fair went very well compared to past years, she admitted that there is always room for improvement. She stated, "I know students are discouraged by the long lines they had to wait in before being interviewed so we are encouraging companies to bring more representatives."

In fact, some companies such as Macy's and Equitable Bank did send more than one representative and consequently had shorter lines which moved more quickly. However, many well-known companies such as T. Rowe Price only sent one representative, producing chronic long lines and frustrated students.

According to Elizabeth Sweet, Class of '88, "There were a lot of opportunities there because there were so many companies present, however, it was unfortunate that you had to wait sometimes a half hour only to be told that there were no positions available."

As stated by Cresaundra C. Sills, Loyola College Career Planning and Placement Office recognizes the diversity of majors at Loyola and consequently, "We try to attract a cross-section of companies that will hire people from all disciplines."

Sills encourages Loyola students to begin preparing for the interview process before they graduate. "Students, especially seniors, should start coming to the (Career Planning and Placement) office and take advantage of our services... I would like for them to get a jump on starting their career."

The Loyola College Career Planning and Placement Office is sponsoring a Summer/Part-time Job Fair on March 17, 1988 in McGuire Hall. Over 25 companies and organizations will be present and Loyola undergraduates are encouraged to attend.

Presented above are the top ten portfolios based on the total value of the portfolio. Several of the portfolio teams executed and realized paper losses that occurred as a result of the Crash. In accordance with the "real world", the Merrill Lynch Portfolio Challenge accounts for realized losses by computing a tax credit, which is then credited to the total value of the portfolio. Conversely, if capital gains were realized, those gains would be taxed and the appropriate amount would be debited from the Cash Management Account. Since the tax credits had a large impact on the portfolio standings, ranking (as seen below) will now be based on after tax values. The after tax method of ranking provides a much truer portfolio standing than merely total portfolio value.

On February 11 during activity period, The FMA will have the annual yearbook photo taken. Also at this time nominations for next year's officers will be accepted. If you wish to be nominated or would like to nominate someone else, and you cannot attend - please call either Joe Scandariato at 532-2894 or Andrew Coyne at 435-6922.

Tijuana

by Shawn Sehl
Senior Features Staff Writer

This Christmas break twenty students, including myself, and two Jesuit scholastics from Loyola, decided to devote some time to helping those "south of the border," and attempt to understand their plight.

We left Tijuana, Mexico on January 4. Our first five days were spent in the border town of San Ysidro, on the California side, at Brown Airfield. Under the auspices of Los Ninos, a volunteer organization, we visited some of the non-profit organizations established to help the needy.

Los Ninos volunteers use U.S. donations of food, clothing, building supplies, toys and medication to help the Mexican poor. In addition to serving as distributors for these donations, the Los Ninos volunteers help the people of Tijuana to plan and establish co-ops in order to improve their standard of living.

Most volunteers are stationed full-time at non-profit organizations within Tijuana or the surrounding area. They ensure that things are running smoothly and that the Mexicans are not lacking supplies or professional help.

My first day was spent at Casa de Cuna (House of The Cradle) with seven of my classmates. Cuna is the largest orphanage in Tijuana with 120 boys and girls from newborn to eight who are taken care of by five Sisters. When we arrived, there was no time wasted on long introductions; some were handed paint brushes, while myself and three others were shown where the four- and five-year-old boys and girls play, unmonitored by adults, in their respective fence-enclosed patios.

Nina Kuhn and I were placed with the little girls, and for two hours we attempted to give each one of them some attention, which they seemed to desire more than all the toys lying on the cement. Even though we did not speak their language, nor they ours, they seemed to enjoy a rare occasion for adult company. The mothers of most of the children live in Tijuana and either can not afford to take care of them or they are prostitutes.

Our experiences in Cuna were only a small part of our experiences during that week. During the course of the week we shared our experiences with individuals from the group, but at the week's end we were given an opportunity to share our experiences with the whole group.

It seemed one thing that we could agree on unanimously, in our comments, was that the Mexicans are indeed very strong, intelligent, gracious, and hopeful people.

Some were given an opportunity to work at Casa de Los Pobres, an organization which prepares over 2,500 meals a day for the homeless of Tijuana and for prisoners held in city prisons. We were placed in the serving line, dishing up eggs, refried beans and tortillas. Most of us expected unfriendly looks, and perhaps unfriendly words from the people through the line, but they were extremely kind and wished us good morning and asked us how we were doing.

This was not an unusual occurrence. Over and over again, we would be amazed by the tenacity and faith of these people who are struggling against a peso so weak the exchange rate is 2,600 pesos to one American dollar.

Some students were taken to sites where conditions are even worse yet. One such site is the Dump Colonia. Families living here earn money by salvaging materials from the dump.

Our last two days and nights were spent at Rancho San Juan Bosco, a home for approximately 45 underprivileged boys, located about an hour east of Tijuana outside the town of Tecate. Bosco began as the dream in the minds of two Los Ninos volunteers, Betsy McEnemey and Bob Stefani, in 1982, which took root in the summer of 1983.

At Bosco, the boys learn self-reliance, enjoy an active sports program, partake in chores, and are given opportunities to learn trades, upon graduation from high school, including carpentry, auto mechanics, farming, electronics, welding and bicycle repair.

Our duties at San Juan Bosco included helping to dig a leach field (Kristen Eck's specialty), fixing meals (scooping avacados), hauling bricks and rocks, roofing, and mixing cement. It could easily have gotten tiring, but the ranch is surrounded by beautiful mountains and a certain kind of inexplicable excitement which only such a special place can occasion, and which seemed to keep one going even after the muscles stiffened.

At night there was time for "Chicano fights" with the boys, who loved beating up on their American visitors, or time to shoot baskets.

On Sunday morning we went to Mass in Tecate. After Mass, we walked through Tecate plaza and bought some breakfast. Tecate is much smaller than Tijuana and though poverty is still apparent, it does not have the cluttered, congested appearance of Tijuana.

During Spring Break, Mr. Clark and Dr. Koterski are planning to take another group of Loyola students to San Juan Bosco. Anyone can apply. Applications are available in CT W156. It is a trip well worth taking.

One final note on our trip to Tijuana: we had remaining money from the donations we received and the fund raisers. We donated this money to different organizations and families according to the needs we saw while in Mexico.

$1,000 was given to help the construction of a home for Guadalupe Acosta Aron and her six children, one of whom had epilepsy.

$150 will pay for Lupe's (the girl with epilepsy) medicine for one year.

$600 was set up in a Loyola educational scholarship, $300 will go to Federico (another child of Guadalupe), and the other half will go to a girl chosen by the Sisters of Pobres.

$600 will be used for construction materials at San Juan Bosco. The last $500 will be used for medical supplies at Casa de Los Pobres.

Chicken Wokery

In the many years that we live our lives, there is an interesting phenomenon that occurs only during birthdays and Christmas. That phenomenon is "The Seemingly Useless Gift Phenomenon." This is when you ask for gifts like a personal computer and a Sony stereo system with a C.D. Instead, in their place, you get a pen and pencil set and a lifetime subscription to Wild Turkey Shoot Magazine.

When I was going into my Sophomore year here at Loyola, I received many seemingly useless gifts for my birthday because I was moving into an apartment. One of those gifts was a Vegemetic slicer, dicer, chopper, mixer, can opener, Swiss army knife, etc., etc. The other was a wok. I never thought I would ever use the odd-shaped piece of equipment in my lifetime, but as always I was wrong. It is an indispensable cooking tool that is essential to a complete kitchen.

There is a lot of talk today about eating healthy. We are told constantly to lower our fat and sodium intake and to maintain a balanced level of proteins, carbohydrates, and vitamins. This does not have to be achieved by eating like a bird and broiling everything. You can eat everything you love to eat, all you have to do is prepare it properly. You can cook anything in a wok with very little oil and retain all of the foods nutrients.

The basics of "wokery" are simple. All you need are your favorite meats, vegetables and seasonings, a little bit of oil and a stove. The possibilities of cooking with a wok are endless. Any combination of foods and flavors is attainable.

For those of you who like chicken here is a great combination:

1 lb. of boneless chicken breast
1/2 cup of each of the following:
broccoli, mushrooms,
carrots, and string beans
1/4 cup of soy or teriyaki sauce
2-3 tablespoons of peanut or vegetable oil

dash of fresh ground pepper

Take your wok and put the oil in, keeping the stove on high. Don't worry about the high heat, this is the key to wok cooking. The food cooks fast and doesn't have time to lose all its natural vitamins and minerals. When the oil is heated throw in the chicken. You can cut up the chicken any way you like. Keep tossing the chicken until it is done (it should be a light brown color). Then add the broccoli, letting it cook for about 2-3 minutes. Then add the rest of the ingredients and continue cooking for no longer than 5 minutes. Add the soy sauce and then remove the food from the wok. Serve this dish over rice and you have a meal that is good for you and only took 10 minutes to prepare.

Try all kinds of variations to fit the food mood you're in. One more important note; don't wash your wok with soap and water! Simply wipe it out with some paper towel. This is called "seasoning" the wok and it adds to the flavor of all you're dishes.

If anyone has any ideas or questions about cooking, please drop them off at the Green and Grey office and I'll be glad to address them in future articles. Thanks!

Swim or Ski?

For all those concerned with the weather over the next month and a half, one of the most important days of the year is fast approaching—February 2, Groundhog Day.

This popular tradition came to America from Great Britain and Germany, where people seemed to feel that the average rodent was better at forecasting the weather than the average weatherman.

The theory behind Groundhog Day states that, on February 2, Candlemas Day, the groundhog would emerge from his hole. If the day is sunny and the groundhog sees his shadow, winter will continue for another six weeks, resulting in a bad harvest. If the day is cloudy and he doesn't see his shadow, a warm spring will follow soon, along with good crops. This belief is found in many English and Scottish rhymes, such as this one:

If Candlemas Day be fair and bright,
Winter will have another flight;
But if it be dark with clouds and rain,
Winter is gone, and will not come again.

Discovery of Israel Found Through People

by Lynn Gatti
Features Staff Reporter

Despite the warnings of escalating conflicts, on December 26, a diverse group of thirty-nine people, headed by Dr. Webster Patterson of Loyola, left for a ten day study tour of Israel. What we discovered there was not something that can be learned through research, and what we felt was not something that could be anticipated.

It was the desert air, the mountain fortresses, the begging children and the modernized cities built over layers of historical ruins that made travelers understand why this is a nation whose people are proud to fight and die for. The true experience was not studying the archeological digs or visiting the multitude of historical ruins that dated back thousands of years. The experience came through interaction with the people, witnessing the blending of different cultures of the Jews, Arabs, and Moslems, and being part of the land that they stand for, defend, and love.

One is not surprised to see young soldiers, patrolling the city streets and the rooftops. Dressed in fatigues and black boots, with a machine gun slung casually over one shoulder, these eighteen to twenty year old men and women are not much different than the college student carrying a backpack around campus. On or off duty, they are the most interesting and the friendliest natives to talk with, as they are eager to use their English and learn of our culture.

At eighteen, these young people are through with secondary schooling or working on a kibbutz (a communal farm where young children go to school and adults and older children work together on the farms). The men serve three years, and the women, two. At the age of twenty or twenty-one, they choose college or return to their kibbutz or other work. I found this aspect of their lives the most difficult to relate to, as something so natural to them is so foreign to us.

The condition of Israel and its future is a constant dread in the lives of all her people, yet it is also a hope that one day they will live in peace. Life goes on, in the cities, the seaports, in the nomadic Bedouin tribes of the Judean desert and hills. The soldiers, the children, the university students, the Arabs on the Old City of Jerusalem, the Orthodox Jews and Greek Catholics, all make up this cultural mosaic. The visitors are welcome. The tourists come in on a spiritual pilgrimage, to walk where Christ walked, taught and prophesied. Others come to take advantage of the typical resort vacation of Eilat. Most

For those interested in taking part in Groundhog Day festivities, there are several places that you could go. The Groundhog Club of Sun Prairie, Wisconsin has cared for their "weather expert" since 1948. Every February 2, the members breakfast on moose milk, coffee and sweet rolls while they wait for the forecast. If you find Wisconsin a bit too far to travel, Pennsylvania is a big fan of Groundhog Day. There are many observances in the Pennsylvania Dutch region in southeast Pennsylvania. The most famous of these is found in Quarryville, home of the Slumbering Groundhog Lodge of Quarryville, founded in 1907. On the morning of Groundhog Day, the members of the lodge put on proper regalia - nightshirts, tip hats, and gold keys worn around the neck on heavy chains - and look for a groundhog hole. When they find one, they observe his behavior and report back to the chief executive of the lodge, who reports it to the rest of the world. Punxsutawney, in western Pa., calls itself the "original home of the great 'weather prognosticator' His Majesty, the Punxsutawney Groundhog." Members of the Punxsutawney Groundhog Club have been watching groundhogs since 1887. Some of the festivities include a Groundhog Breakfast and Banquet. There is a Groundhog Hop, which is presided over by the Groundhog King and Queen, elected at the local high school.

Metorologists tend to scoff at the groundhog's ability. One survey claimed that, over a sixty year period, the groundhog was right twenty-eight percent of the time. Supporters of the groundhog tend to have different data. According to the chief executive of the Slumbering Groundhog Lodge, "Our records show that the groundhog has forecast the weather with absolute, one hundred percent accuracy."

fascinating and overwhelming is to be where the stories of The Bible took place and being able to relate in some way the present-day religious teachings. Israel is a rich land, in the spirit and reality that its people live.

Although at the time of our tour, the media exaggerated the conflicts and danger in the country, today it is very accurate. Most recently, the fighting has moved from the banks and into the major cities of Jerusalem, Bethlehem, and Nazareth. It has been stated that Israel's present state has not been as bad since the War of 1967, when it held out and finally won the Gaza Strip. And even as the war continues to disrupt and scar the land, the soldiers still fight with a renewed reverence.

PREDICTIONS FOR THE SPRING SEMESTER

by Bill Egging

At least 1 person will attend an on-campus dance featuring a band that no one has ever heard of...

At least 1 one person under the legal drinking age will drink a beer on campus. Maybe two!

At least 1 on-campus party will be busted by security... before one o'clock.

At least 1 person will be offended by my cartoons, and threaten me with bodily harm.

Don't turn your back on us! We're here to stay this time. Kinda like a couple of recurring, festering, opinionated boils on the butt of our editor-in-chief. The following 1987 shopping list is brought to you by your two best buddies in the whole wide world. Now. We command you. Caze upon the mesmerizing, swirling hypno-disc, and repeat the almighty hypno-chant: "I will buy these, I will buy these, I will buy these . . . tomorrow."

In no particular order, great albums of '87:

Replacements -- Pleased To Meet Me
R.E.M. -- Document
10,000 Maniacs -- In My Tribe
Husker Du -- Warehouse: Songs And Stories
The Connells -- Boylan Heights
Ramones -- Halfway to Sanity
The Housemartins -- The People Who Grinned Themselves To Death
Richard Lloyd -- Real Time
That Petrol Emotion -- Babble
Miracle Legion -- Surprise Surprise Surprise
David Sylvain -- Secrets of the Beehive
Hunters and Collectors -- Living Daylight (ep)
The Cult -- Electric
Chris Isaak -- Chris Isaak
Dumptruck -- for the country

And just for good measure, and while Mom and Pop ain't looking, here's five great singles from five good albums:

Dukes of Stratospheer -- "Vanishing Girl"
The dB's -- "I Lie"
X -- "4th of July"
Vigil -- "I Love You Equinox"
The Smiths -- "A Rush And A Push And The Land Is Ours"

And because we care about you, the discriminating, discerning, well-read music aficionado, and also because we're real lazy and can't think of anything else to write . . . One More List!!

Chumps Of The Year

The Annoying Heavy-Set Guy From The Nissan Commercials

Billy Joel, the Rocker, who goes over to Russkie-land, throws a tantrum 'cuz the Kreminites don't go ape over his tunes, then releases a self-serving live lp of this epoch-making event. With a red cover yet. No one bought it. Next year we'll send the Commies Chuck Berry and Link Wray and let 'em know rock 'n' roll isn't dead in the U.S.

Jim sez: "C'mon. Just one more chump and we can grab a beer."
Joe sez: "Howzabout Boy George?"
Jim sez: "Who?"
Joe sez: "You remember, buddy. That fruity patootie who spent a lotta time doin' shootie."
Jim sez: "Oh yeah. The guy who played in all the westerns."
Joe sez: "No, no. That's Clint Eastwood. But it's easy to get the two confused."

Eyes & Ears

Sick of the movies, television, looking for something to do off campus? Here are a few ideas of things to do during, at least, the next 168 hours. (That's one week for those who can't divide):

Hopkins University of Special Events starts its February Wednesday Noon Series with: Black American Heroes: Performances Depicting Significant Contributions, February 3rd, at 12 noon. Free to the public. Held in the Carrett Room of the Hopkins Library. For information call 338-7157.

Walters Art Gallery presents Discovering the Great West: Explorer-Photographers of the 1860's and 1870's, February 4th at 8 p.m. Tickets for students are $4. For more information, call 547-9000 ext. 236.

Theatre Project - Charabanc in Somewhere Over the Balcony. Dark, indigenous humor, set in war-torn Belfast, Ireland. Through February 14 at the Theatre Project on West Preston Street. Tickets for students are $5-$7 with student ID. For more information call 752-8558.

Center Stage - Paradise Lost by Clifford Odets. American family's struggle to maintain the dignity of life during the Great Depression. Through February 22 at Center Stage. Tickets $12-$25. Half price tickets for students with ID. For more information call 332-0033.

Baltimore Opera - Martha by Friedrich von Flotow. Story of two women who disguise themselves as maidservants for amusement. February 11, 13, and 15 at the Lyric Opera House, 527 N. Charles Street. Tickets $15-$42.50 - half price for students. For more information call 685-0693.

Morris A. Mechanie - Shakespeare's Macbeth starring Christopher Plummer and Glenda Jackson. Set in ancient Scottish Highlands, the tragedy tells the story of Macbeth and Lady Macbeth's calculated villainy to take over the throne. Through February 21st. Tickets range from $21-$34. For more information call 625-1400.

Somewhere Over the Balcony

by Anita Broceolino
Assistant Entertainment Editor

Did you know that MTA bus number 11 will take you to the "war zone" on Northern Ireland? Well, not exactly . . . but with the help of Charabanc, an all-woman theatre production company from Ireland, you will find yourself transported to the Divis Flats of Belfast.

While the production is obviously of a serious nature, it also focuses on the daily lives of three Irish women: how they work around their oppression, often in a humorous way. Somewhere over the Balcony is a must-see that runs through February 14 at the Theatre Project at 45 W. Preston Street. Tickets range in price from $5-$7 for students. For more information, call 539-3091 or 752-8558.

O'Connor Triumphs with Debut

by Debbi Olley
Entertainment Staff Writer

In the barren desert of the music world, few artists continue to compose and perform songs which serve to renew our faith in music as the ultimate form of communication, a device which crosses cultures and races and destroys the barriers in the process. Sinead O'Connor is one such artist.

Her debut album, The Lion and the Cobra, which was released in late 1987, is sure to bring her the attention she so richly deserves. Because O'Connor is Irish, it might be easy to dismiss her as riding on the coattails of other more well-known Irish bands, such as U2 or The Pogues. This is not so. Sinead O'Connor, although certainly influenced by her contemporaries (and, in a larger capacity, her country's rich musical background), possesses a style which is completely her own, a style at once raw and poignant, powerful and gorgeous in a word, brilliant.

O'Connor's vocals dip and peak in a series of shrieks and wails and subsequent softness which bring to mind both Siouxsie Sioux and Kate Bush. It is easy to believe in banshees and fairies when Miss O'Connor sings. The Lion and the Cobra opens with "Jackie", a song which describes a dead girl who awaits in vain the return of her lover.

The synthesis of romanticism and mysticism which is so unique to Irish ballads is evidenced in "Jackie", which is like a narrative poem with dark chords hovering in the background. "Jackie" is moody and evocative; consequently the listener is rather surprised by "Mandinka", the next track, which, with its definitive drum and bass line, is probably the closest to pop that O'Connor ever gets. In "Mandinka", O'Connor sings lyrics that are semi-discernible which alone would make this song a possible target for a top 40 radio show. But it is her vocals which save her from this fate. Fortunately, Sinead O'Connor's voice possesses neither the whining quality nor the repetitive monotone of many popular "vocalists" that are so sought after in the pop world.

Her vocals are fresh and clean and so is her music.

"Jerusalem", which follows "Mandinka", begins slowly with an interesting bass line but the song gains infinite power when O'Connor's honey-rich vocals emerge. In it, O'Connor carries her voice to limitless heights, and the song itself is sparked with lyrics that are conducive to this experimentation, such as "hope you don't two-time/sit'd be the big time/never mean it next time/show time." The remaining tracks of The Lion and the Cobra provide O'Connor with many opportunities to utilize her incredible voice, but the strength of the songs "Just Like U Said It Would B" and "Troy" rely more upon the power of music than vocals.

"Just Like U Said It Would B" combines countless musical devices and styles, such as the acoustic introduction which is rooted in folk and the entire rhythm of the song which is built upon a waltz tempo. The synthesizer takes on new meaning as it duplicates violins and flutes within the melody line, but this sense of duplication is not reflected in the music itself, which is composed of numerous variations on the theme. The rolling melody and rhythm is as soothing as a lullaby, until O'Connor reaches a crescendo, in which the full force of the music is realized.

In "Troy", the music itself tells the story of the singer's jealousy and obsessive love, and vocals seem unnecessary. "Troy" is comprised almost entirely of strings, with violins to relate the story of the singer's initial pure and devoted love for Troy but when she questions "Does she hold you like I do?" the strings reach new heights as the singer's pain and jealousy becomes evident. When she sings "But I will rise/and I will return/The phoenix from the flame/I have learned I will rise... There is no other Troy for me to burn", deeper cellos and violas are employed to reflect her destructive and dangerous feelings. The strength of the strings carry the narrative in a loud rush which is never really resolved, only muted as the song, and at least one of the members of the triangle, dies. The Lion and the Cobra possesses all of the raw poetry and beauty of music's past, present, and future. It is a phenomenal triumph.

Sports

On the Court, Field, and in the Classroom, Nattans has a winning Record

by Stacey Tiedge
Sports Editor

The academic athlete—it's what every collegiate athletic program looks to recruit. It's the type of student every collegiate athletic program hopes to have on its sports rosters. And it's a perfect description of Loyola's Jeff Nattans, an honor student who plays scholarship soccer and basketball while maintaining a 3.9 average.

While many might be awed by Nattans' achievements, the junior accounting major isn't surprised or overwhelmed by what he's accomplished. He said that managing his time between school and sports is a way of life for him.

Nattans, a naturally talented and versatile athlete said, "In grade school, the nuns always told us to use the talents God gave us." Nattans listened, and has been making great strides on the soccer field, basketball court, and in the classroom ever since. He said that he could never be satisfied with anything less than doing his best.

The secret behind Nattans' success is simple. He's driven and he's organized. Competing in sports and in the classroom has become a way of life for him. Nattans said, "I've always worked to be the best I can be. I could never be happy with my performance in anything unless I knew that I had given it my best shot."

Nattans' philosophy to work to be the best he could be was greatly influenced by the people he grew up with. Nattans said that his family always was a big influence. Nattans' older brother Joe, who played baseball and soccer for Western Maryland was one role model in his life, and Nattans' Towson neighborhood also housed many others. Loyola's own women's field hockey and lacrosse coach Sandy Lanahan Campanaro grew up across the street from Nattans. While Nattans watched her move on to the World Lacrosse Team, another lacrosse powerhouse was practicing on the neighborhood playing fields. While growing up, Nattans competed with Lance Kohler and David and Steve Maynes. Kohler later went on to star in a Pepsi lacrosse commercial and the Maynes brothers played lacrosse and soccer respectively for Loyola. As a boy, Nattans played baseball in addition to soccer and basketball, but if you ask him which sport is his favorite, he'll smile and say, "Wheeling."

When Nattans entered Calvert Hall High School, he took his game from the neighborhood to the Calvert Hall gym floor. It was while playing high school soccer and basketball that Nattans learned how to strive for excellence in the classroom and on the court.

Nattans has always made the most of his gifts, but he asserts, "I want to do well just like anybody else." Nattans doesn't like to be set apart from the crowd. Just like everyone else, he knows hard work pays off. But sometimes the hard work doesn't guarantee that the game will be won or the grade will be made.

Nattans said that disappointment inspires him to do better the next time. He said, "I'll be upset for awhile if I mess up, but then I start thinking about how to get it right the next time around."

tends study hall at night, and then will either go out with friends or do something else later in the evening. He said that if he has a big test he'll study more and not go out, but then he said, "Who wouldn't if they really wanted to do well?"

Freshman year was difficult for Nattans, but once he worked his way through it, he was able to devise a system of organizing his time that got him through the next years. He said that just like anybody else, there were plenty of times when he just felt like throwing in the towel. There were plenty of times when he wondered what it would be like if he only played one sport or no sports, or if he let his grades slide. But then he always knew that he couldn't be happy with himself if he didn't work to the best of his abilities. He couldn't sell himself short.

Nattans lives in an apartment with posters on his wall and a J.T. McKinley's baseball hat on his desk. Between a poster of Dr. J. holding a smoking basketball and one of Rick Davis winding up for a kick, hangs a poster from the movie "The Flamingo Kid." Nattans points to the words that Matt Dillon struts confidently above, "Everyone knew what Jeffrey should do with his life. Everyone was wrong."

Nattans said that while he was in high school, if someone had asked him for advice in how to succeed, he wouldn't have known what to tell them. But he said he'll never forget the answer his Calvert Hall

Nattans feels that the key to accomplishment is setting goals and working hard toward accomplishing what you know you can do. He said, "If you decide where you want to end up, and then set your goals for one level higher, if you fall short, you'll end up where you wanted to be in the first place."

But in terms of priorities, it's the people in Nattans' life that mean the most to him. He said, "You can't get too caught up in what you're doing. Friends and family are really important. People will always be there but school and sports will someday come to an end."

Nattans said that he has no secret method for getting good grades. He said he goes to classes in the morning, practices with a team in the afternoon, at basketball teammate, Duane Ferrell, who now plays for Georgia Tech, gave a young boy who asked him that very question.

Nattans said that Ferrell, balancing an armful of trophies after a big game, crouched down to the level of the small boy. He looked into the shining wide eyes of the boy brave enough to approach him and said, "Just work to be the best you can be."

Greyhounds Win

by Kevin Wells
Assistant Sports Editor

Cougar Amatucci does smile. After watching his team blow a 16 point lead and let a very young NAIA Caldwell team take Loyola into overtime, Coach Amatuucci had to wonder if he was going to have another night where sleep seemed as hard to get as a win.

Cougar Amatuucci did sleep well and so did the Greyhounds, as they broke out of their four game losing streak and defeated Caldwell in overtime, 91-86, in front of 620 people at Reitz Arena last Thursday night.

Loyola (4-15, 2-6) jumped out to a quick lead over Caldwell (7-12) and led 16-9. With 5:33 off the first half clock, Cougar's coach, Rich Marshall received a double technical foul and Mike Morrison sank three out of four from the line. "I lost my composure and really blew up, but one of our players got mugged at one side of the court and no foul was called," said Marshall.

Caldwell managed to sneak back in to the game and cut the lead to 18-17 but John Boney and Morrison scored the Greyhound's next ten points and Loyola went up by ten again, 29-19. Boney and Morrison combined for 62 of the Greyhound's 90 points, as Boney threw in 30 and Morrison 32.

Loyola led Caldwell by a substantial margin for the rest of the half and took a 44-38 lead into the locker room.

The Greyhounds jumped out to a quick 14 point lead, 54-40, at the beginning of the second half. Their steady lead over Caldwell was never really threatened during the first fifteen minutes of the half, and the Greyhounds looked like they were going to pick up their fourth win of the year in simple fashion.

Enter the Cougar three-pointer. With 3:26 left to play, Rob Williams threw up a three-point bomb and the Cougars went on to score the next seven points and cut the lead to 75-74. In the short span Caldwell hit 3 three-pointers. Caldwell attempted an amazing 28 three-point shots; they converted on nine of them.

With a minute to play Hollivan Billups drove the length of the court and scored on a layup to put Loyola up 77-74. Then once again, Caldwell responded with yet another three-pointer by Williams and tied the score at 77 with 37 seconds remaining.

Billups missed on a drive up the middle and Loyola found themselves in overtime. "We were not aggressive enough during those three minutes when they began to come back and their press was working well against us," said Amatuucci.

Ken DiLeo began the overtime for Caldwell by hitting a three-pointer and the Cougars went up by three. Then the Boney and Morrison show went to work for the remainder of the five minute period and carried the young Greyhounds to victory. Boney scored four and Morrison put in six. Mike Wagner also converted on two important free throws with nine seconds remaining to put the game out of reach.

"Good things are starting to happen, our attitude at practices is outstanding, and we are still going to fight for a playoff spot," said an optimistic Amatuucci.

Lady Greyhound Intensity Can't Upset Fighting Scots

by Katie O'Donnell
Sports Staff Writer

The Loyola Women's basketball team lost to Monmouth College at Reitz Arena on Wednesday, January 20th after playing the most disciplined first half of their 1988 season. Loyola's offensive and defensive strategy failed in controlling Monmouth and the Fighting Scots beat the Lady Greyhounds 69-58. Loyola, losing to Monmouth College one week earlier by 25 points, intensified their court play and kept Monmouth to an 11 point victory.

"The first half constituted the best twenty minutes of basketball that the team has played in this 1988 season," said Coach Frank Syzmanski, head coach for the Lady Greyhounds. The players, executing shots with precision and playing disciplined ball, shot 50 percent from the floor in the first half. Team stability gave the players the momentum to shoot underneath the basket against Monmouth's 6'5" center, Sandra Cook.

Loyola's aggressive attack in the first half resulted from the players' abilities to stay in motion, make successful picks, and outsmart Monmouth's Sandra Cook. Loyola's Maria Beam and Mary Cay Hamilton battled against Sandra Cook for position and for the shot underneath the basket.

Loyola utilized "excellent defense" according to Coach Syzmanski, in combating Monmouth's dominating attack. Loyola pressured Monmouth by gaining position and causing them to foul and travel. Lady Greyhound Gale Bohncarzky commented about the first half. "It was the best our team has played this season. Monmouth was confused and we had good rhythm."

Monmouth came into the second half with the intensity to overcome Loyola's four point halftime lead, 38-34. Mon-mouth's Cook kept Loyola from gaining position, causing Loyola to have trouble rebounding. "We were not prepared, neither physically nor mentally to contend with Monmouth's attack," stated Coach Syzmanski. Monmouth ready on attack, overtook the Greyhound lead, but Loyola remained in striking distance the entire second half. "We tried to play catch-up ball and that isn't possible to do against a number one team like Monmouth," commented coach Syzmanski.

Coming into the second half, the Lady Greyhounds lost their first half intensity. Gale Bohncarzky explained, "In the second half we played competitive ball. We have to learn from our mistakes and realize that it takes two good halves before we can get the game in the win column. Once the two good halves of basketball are put together, we can beat any team in the conference."

Rugby Readies for Spring

by Paul T. Cygnarowicz
Sports Staff Writer

Loyola's men's rugby club will have a stronger motivation when they begin their spring season next month. The team will compete as a wild card entry in the Eastern Rugby Union Tournament for a chance to go to the National finals.

The playoff format for men's college rugby is much more complex than other sports. Clubs compete during the spring and fall, usually fielding three teams per match. Although three teams (A-side, B-side, and C-side) compete for the club, only the A-side score has a bearing on the rankings. A team receives points depending on who their opponent is. The highest point totals are awarded for winning matrix games—those against league opponents. At the end of the fall season two playoff teams are determined from each division and the tournament games are scheduled in the spring.

Loyola is coming off a highly successful 6-3 fall season, which earned them a wild card berth in the ERU tournament. No previous Loyola team had ever gone that far. Team captain Steve Walsh credits the team's cohesiveness and flexibility. He comments, "We changed our style of play, refined it. It's now more of a fifteen man style." Walsh believes the team's experience as a unit aided the transition. The highlight of the season was a stunning 28-4 rout of Maryland.

The rugger's first tournament match is tentatively scheduled for March 26 against James Madison. If they can advance, they'll face other top rugby clubs in the East including Army, Dartmouth, and Navy. Tom Smith, who handles scheduling said, "Our toughest problem will be [eventually] facing the Naval Academy. Historically, they've been our toughest opponent." In fact, last fall's hard-fought 7-0 loss to Navy was thought by onlookers to be the best level of performance in team history.

This spring, Loyola will be without aggressive senior Kevin Haynes, who retired after a severe back injury. Also, the team loses team leader Ivan Lopez-Muniz and prolific playmaker and scoring threat Tom Howe to graduation. However, seniors Rob Walters and Cliff Thomas return to A-side upon their recovery from injuries. Club President Paul Leath assures that the team "has total confidence" in Tom Malone, who replaces Lopez-Muniz. On the team's outlook, Leath affirms, "We haven't lost the edge at all. We'll be ready, I know that."

Tonight [Feb. 1] the club meets for a reorganizational meeting on the upper level of the cafeteria. All those interested in coming out for the club are welcome to attend.

Georgetown Sinks Seadogs

by Scott Sero
Asst. Photography Editor

Tied with only one event to go, it looked as if the Lady Seadogs might gain their first victory against the Georgetown Hoyas swim team. Loyola had three of its best swimmers in the ladies 400m freestyle relay, but they still only managed to take second. Once again the Lady Seadogs lost to Georgetown, this time by the score, 109-106.

"The picture in the men's side of the column was even worse. From the outset, it appeared that the Seadogs were outmatched. As one swimmer put it, 'We were used today!'"

There were a few bright spots in both losses. For the men, Paul Ryan won the 200m IM and the 200m Backstroke. Marcia Blick and Christin Rogers won two events each for the women.

Even though both the men's and women's teams lost Saturday, this has been a most encouraging season for the Seadogs. According to Head Coach Tom Murphy, this is by far the largest team, in quantity and quality that Loyola has had, with records of 8-3 for the men and 11-1 for the women.

Murphy said that this is the first time both the men's team and the women's team are strong. He added, "We've never had two good teams at the same time." Concerning the Tri-State Championships February 19, 20, and 21, Murphy commented, "Everything we're doing right now is pointing toward the Tri-States."

The women's swim team meets Towson State in the Reitz Pool tomorrow at 4p.m. Their next home meet will be the Maryland States Swim Meet, February 7.

Paul Ryan

by Amy Misner
Sports Staff Writer

This week the Green & Grey is recognizing two top Loyola swimmers as Athletes of the Week.

From the men's team the G & G has chosen Paul Ryan, co-captain, and the season's top scorer to date as well as one of the five leading point producers in the school's history.

Ryan has been MVP for the last two years and holds school records in six events including the 200m. Individual Medley, and the 200m. Butterfly. He also holds pool records in the 100m. Backstroke and 100m. Individual Medley.

"I have always loved swimming and was active in it in high school, and I love the people. Everyone is really friendly," said Ryan.

Ryan is a graduate student in Loyola's MBA program, and will start working full time for Price Waterhouse in July. He was eligible to swim this year since he did not swim his freshman year. Aside from school and swimming, Paul likes to compete in triathlons and will compete in the Bud Light triathlon this June.

Ryan feels that the quality of the team has improved over the years, "We have been able to recruit good freshmen to make up for graduating seniors," he said.

Athlete of the Week

Marcia Blick

The team is looking for wins for both the men and the women at Tri-State Championships, February 19-21, at Bryn Mawr College, Bryn

Paul Ryan

Marcia Blick

Mawr, Pennsylvania.

At Tri-States he hopes to qualify in the 400m. Individual Medley, for Easterns, March 3-5, which will top off his collegiate swimming career.

Marcia Blick, co-captain of the women's swimming team, has also been named Athlete of the Week by the Green & Grey.

Marcia holds six pool records, and twelve school records in events from the 400m. Individual Medley to the 200m. Breaststroke. She is also a member of the record holding 200, 400, and 800m. Medley Relay team.

Marcia has led her team in scoring with 171 points this season and 1,118 points in her Loyola career to date.

Marcia was a member of the U.S. Swim Team for her city of Rockville, Maryland, while she was in High School.

The Senior marketing major, whose home is now in Colorado Springs, Colorado, had not planned on swimming in college. After going out for the team as a freshman, she found it a lot of fun and a good way to meet a lot of people, and kept with it.

Blick said, "Swimming has made me more self-disciplined and forced me to budget my time."

"The team is like a big family and everyone is welcome no matter what their ability," she added.

The combination of a larger team and an increase in quality has made the team stronger, according to Blick.
